Bickley resided.[20] Though a native of Virginia, Bickley had actually been known by name as an adventurer and also bad with finances.[21] His main focus was also not on preserving the Confederate States of America (CSA), but restoring slavery in southern neighboring countries which he wanted to make part of a proposed nation dubbed "Golden Circle".[21] While some members of the group would join the Confederate Army, Bickley was more focused on colonizing parts of northern Mexico as slave states.[21] He would not join the Confederate Army until after his expeditions in Mexico faltered in 1863.[21] Soon afterwards, the organization was exposed and many members were arrested while attempting to steal numerous gold shipments from San Francisco Bay.[22][23][24] Following the outbreak of the American Civil War numerous Golden Circle members were not focused on fighting Union states north of the Mason-Dixon Line like the film suggests, but were pre-occupied with making the Union territory of New Mexico a part of the proposed Golden Circle nation as well.[25][26] Those who operated in the North mostly aligned with Copperhead politicians who preferred a negotiated end to the war.[27] Bickley, who served the Confederate Army for months as a surgeon to General Braxton Bragg, would be captured in Indiana in July 1863 on charges of being a Confederate spy and remained in house arrest until October 1865.[21] The month before his arrest, Bickley abandoned the Confederate Army after preferring to settle in Tennessee.[21] Former members would also name its successor organization the Order of the Sons of Liberty in 1864, the year before Lincoln's assassination.[28] This successor organization was exposed the same year it was founded and members were arrested and tried for treason.[29] The film's suggestion that Britain wanted a strong alliance with the Confederate States of America was also highly unlikely.
